Fund Manager Comments

A note on currency risk or 'perceived risk': Reviewing the recent and long term performance of African and international currencies against the USD, it becomes clear that the historical performance of African currencies does not match the 'perceived risk'. Over the past year (as at end February 2015), contrary to common perception, the Nigerian Naira has depreciated against the USD by a similar margin to the Euro i.e. 23%. Over longer time periods (10 & 15 years), the Nigerian Naira and the other two main unpegged African currencies (the Egyptian Pound and the Kenyan Shilling), broadly obey the conventional exchange rate theory on interest rate differentials, exchange rate differentials and purchasing power parity (which are already incorporated into the discount rates used to compute company fair value estimates in local currency). It is important to balance expected currency losses against expected returns in local currency terms. The fund's Nigerian stock holdings are partial currency hedges with expected returns of over 100% (in local currency terms), which makes a potential moderate further Naira depreciation seem inconsequential.
