Fund Manager Comments

In Nigeria, a new broom sweeps clean

Our investment team recently visited Lagos, Nigeria for a very insightful week of company research. Given the extent of the socio-economic and political changes that the country has undergone over the past year, it was a useful opportunity to revisit our investment hypothesis for the fund's core Nigerian holdings (currently 16.2% of portfolio). We left the country with renewed conviction on the strength of the investment case for our Nigerian holdings, which is neatly encapsulated by the following extract from our management transcript on Access Bank (currently Nigerian commercial banks represent 10% of Africa Sustainability Fund): "... the combination of material net interest margin expansion of 35% (with cost of deposits declining from 5.9% to 4.0% by year-end) and material growth in fees and commissions (the monthly run rate on fees and commissions has expanded from N300m to N2.0bn - yet to reflect fully in financial results) bodes well for sustained earnings generation in 2016. Access Bank currently trades on a PE ratio of 1.9, PB ratio of 0.38 and a cash dividend yield of over 13%."

Anecdotally, we observed some significant changes in the country. Having travelled to Nigeria fairly regularly for the past 7-8 years, the average time between disembarking the plane in Lagos and leaving the airport has generally been 2-3 hours. On this occasion, we were ushered through customs in less than 15 minutes, with visibly less skulduggery and remarkable efficiency. In a memorable interview with a pre-IPO diaper manufacturer, the CEO mentioned that tariffs in Nigeria that have previously been ignored (due to corrupt practices) are now being clearly enforced. Everybody in Nigeria seems to agree that the new President has ethical backbone and that there will be less corruption under his watch. However, there is less certainty over what his government's economic policy direction will be. Although Nigeria is a country of 180m people, a handful of strong and competent leaders at the most senior level of government can make all the difference. The key question is whether Mr Buhari will be sensible enough to surround himself with a cabinet of capable technocrats. The early signs have been promising, with the appointment of Harvard-educated lawyer and oil industry veteran Emmanuel Ibe Kachikwu (previously ExxonMobil) to lead the government's oil and gas affairs. The full list of Ministers appointed to President Buhari's cabinet will be made public later this week.
